5th Annual International Symposium on Preventing Human Trafficking: Prevention, Protection, Prosecution

Overview

The problem of human trafficking is an increasingly disturbing phenomenon in Europe with terrible consequences for victims, the majority of whom are forced into various forms of sexual and labour exploitation. The International Labour Organization (ILO) estimates that 20.9 million people worldwide were trafficked between 2002 and 2011, and numbers are not likely to decrease.

According to the 2012 UNDOC Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, women and girls together account for about 75 per cent of victims detected globally, while around one million children are trafficked worldwide. Whilst women and children remain the most vulnerable victims, men are also exploited through forced labour or criminal activities.

Human trafficking is widely recognised as a serious crime but progress in prosecution and conviction remains limited because of the complex nature of cases. This confirms the need to raise public awareness of trafficking, improve training in order to better identify victims, and develop better co-operation and multi-agency working – all are critical in the fight against trafficking. The modus operandi of criminal groups and traffickers is always evolving, and the increased use of the internet as a means of recruitment and trafficking poses serious challenges to police and other relevant services.

At the EU level, there are two tools to act as guidance. The EU Directive 2011/36 lays down provisions to prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers. To underpin this, the EU Strategy towards the Eradication of Trafficking in Human Beings 2012-2016 sets out concrete and practical measures to be implemented over the next few years, placing victims at the forefront. At a global level, the Group of Experts on Action Against Trafficking in Human Beings (GRETA) is responsible for monitoring the implementation of the Council of Europe Convention on Action Against Trafficking in Human Beings. The United Nations Office on Drug and Crimes (UNDOC) also published tools and training material to help in tackling human trafficking. International, national and local organisations must join forces to improve multi-agency cooperation to better help victims of human trafficking, track perpetrators and share information.

In order to encourage greater political will, facilitate policy discussion and explore comprehensive solutions to properly recognise the needs of all victims of human trafficking, Public Policy Exchange is proud to host this annual symposium and welcomes the participation of all key partners, responsible authorities and stakeholders. The Symposium will support the exchange of ideas and encourage delegates to engage in thought-provoking topical debate.

“ Global forces are changing the dynamics of crime everywhere, in particular those relating to technology, increased human mobility, and growing interconnections in the world economy. Globalisation has delivered many benefits to society but it also has a dark side, particularly on the Internet, responsible for producing dislocations in society and significant new shifts in criminal activity. The case of human trafficking illustrates the point. The Internet is now a primary recruitment instrument for victims and, of course, a vending service for those forced to work in the sex industry. Meanwhile the expansion in global transportation networks, the rise of the low-cost airlines, and the freedom of movement between the majority of EU member states for example, have all provided new opportunities for those responsible for the trade in human trafficking...”
